

How to find jobs for graduates

Having a degree gives you an enormous advantage in today's world. Whatever your area of study or subject you have graduated in just having a degree says something about you. It gives potential employers confidence that you are able to achieve at a higher level.

Some degrees are directly linked to specific professions, Education, Medicine and Veterinary sciences for example. If you graduate in one of these then you will obviously be looking at specific professional journals. Often an internship can lead to a permanent position.

For most other graduates a rich source of opportunity comes via Graduate Career Fairs. These are an important resource for graduate appointments. Companies, Businesses and other organisations will provide a range of employment opportunities. Even if you don't get a placement as a direct result of a graduate fair you are still taking important steps towards your chosen career. These fairs give you a chance to meet a potential employer face to face and they acquaint you with the demands of the job. You will be able to develop your interview skills and it is a great way for you to learn about the industry/profession in which you are interested. They can give you information, possible contacts and of course can be a great experience.

Another possible route to finding a job is through the internet. Graduate Job Search for example enables you to look at specific jobs in your chosen sector and offers a regional perspective showing the opportunities in the part of the country or possibly abroad, depending on where you would like to work.
