Poetry Competition

Many of you have put pen to paper recently for the Words Worth Reading Valentine's Poetry Competition. With a generous prize of a romantic Champagne and chocolate hamper it's not surprising that so many of you took part. The winning poem below was written by Pam Cersae

Love in Poetry

Shakespeare chose comparison
McGough, rhyming lines
Duffy edged for contemporary slang
Byron, traditional lines.

But for me the beauty of poetry
lies in truth,
In silent observation
In honest eyes.
And so inadvertently and unapologetically
I witness all that you are;
For in you, the colour of poetry lies.

The rest of the finalists poems are on the forum which can be reached via our website at www.wordsworthreading.co.uk

Help is at hand!

The team are preparing for an influx of student essays and dissertations. With offers allowing students to submit an entire term's worth of essays, from just £60, they are expecting a record number of submissions. Words Worth Reading have spent a considerable amount of time this month adding to the bank of knowledge and support available for free through their website. If you're looking for support finding a job, writing an essay or book, or even after advice on how to present your work to publishers then Words Worth Reading has a wealth of information and articles to help you on your way. Just look at the Resources section on the website.
